

PRICE, THREEPENCE

Notes.—The paddock can be subdivided into four allotments, two of 20 feet each and the two front ones of 108 feet each. The front two roads, each 10 feet wide, and two of 20 feet frontage each in Finlay street by 80 feet deep. Fine house and one of the most delightful sites for a round Sydney. The embellishes comprising the door makes it now almost as convenient as city property; but if what will it be when the Railway is at the door.

The cottage is at present occupied by Richards, a weekly remittance of £10 Terms, half cash; the residence on completion of the conveyance within twenty-one months of date of sale.

Plan on view at the auction room.

[illegible]

Mr. THOMAS BARKER, in offering a very few observations on the important question before the Council, could not but express extreme surprise at the result of the vote which had fallen during the debate from non-members as to the position of the nominees who, by authority of the Imperial Act in that behalf passed, had been elected to the office of non-elective members. He had actually thought that a gentleman sitting there as a non-elective member had actually lost his position in society. He (Mr. B.) desired to ask upon what grounds such a suggestion was made. He had no doubt that the Council would assert that he had as much right to speak and to vote there as any of the elective members. Really, a stranger unacquainted with the constitution of the colony would imagine that the Council were a body of a most respectable set; with no consciousness of stakes in the country; no integrity; in fact, that they were men of straw. (Heard, hear.) Mr. B. then proceeded to assert that the non-elective members were fully as respectable and independent as the elective, and therefore he could not understand on what ground they were to be shut out from sitting at the Council table. The nominees were not chargeable with having broken their promises to their constituents; charge too often justly made against those who are elected to office. He had no objection to the electors which they never sought to do, and did not keep in the Council Chamber (Heard, hear.) He (Mr. Barker) was sorry that the hon. and learned member for Cornwallis had not been present, and that he had desired to allude to several points, whereupon he considered that non-elective members had stigmatised the nominees most unjustly. With reference to the Bill before the Council, Mr. B. said that he was not at all with all that had fallen from those who had given them warm tribute of praise to the hon. and learned friend of the Bill and his associates. The report by which it was accompanied was a very valuable document, worthy to be ranked with any statement of the oldest legislatures. (Heard.) Looking at the despatches, and all the various reports which he had seen, he was satisfied that the mother country on the subject of the New Constitution, he (Mr. Barker) felt that the House was bound by the compact recently struck through all this correspondence, to support most heartily the Bill, and that, in Excellence, in recommending the petition of that Council, certainly had a nominee Upper House in view, and when to that House it was proposed to appropriate the revenues of the colony, to the disposal of the waste lands, unshackled, save by a civil list—the amount of which was left to the Council to determine—it was most certain that the House had no alternative but to make Upper House a main condition in the compact. As to the probable choice of nominees by the Government, could there be in the minds of any reasonable man the least doubt that the nominees would be men of high rank, of honour, property, and intelligence,—men every respect identified with the best interest of the colony. This had been called a money bill, and it was not a money bill, but a bill which was too truly called so. He was afraid that very many people thought of the acquisition of money only—and nothing else. He feared danger from the arts of these mere money-getters, who would be sure to get into the lower chamber, effect the most ruinous schemes of spoliation. (Heard.) One of their first acts would most likely be to lower the minimum price of the waste lands, and this they should be able to do, by offering up those that were available. This might be easily done by half a dozen designing men and the knowledge that it could be done was what Mr. B.'s opinion, the real reason why the movers of the Bill were so anxious to see the Bill pass, was that they would be successful out of doors; on no other ground could he conceive that the leaders would so intentionally have exposed themselves to a loss. A few daring speculators (if the agitation without prevailed) might swallow up the waste lands of the colony; each pocket one or two hundred thousands pounds, and then leave the country to the ruin of Mr. Barker would support the second reading of the Bill. (Cheers.)

Mr. THURLOW, in rising to address the House at this late period of the debate, said that he was very anxious to have the opportunity in joining in the discussion of this most important question. He felt that out of doors he had to a certain extent been committed to the support of the Bill, and that he had all the liberty of a free agent in respect to it. He had come into the House by an accident,—by a vacancy occurring from the absence of one of the members for the city of Sydney at the general election. Now it was known that when that election took place this question of a Constitution was spoken of very largely. The constituents had brought up by the select committee of the session, and laid upon the table, were canvassed by the public and the Press; and it was very generally considered out of doors that the House would be bound to support the Bill before being brought before the House in the present session, and if this conviction had not been entertained no doubt there would have been a large number in favour of a dissolution of the Council. Feeling that he had wished to know what could be said in defence of the Bill before he expressed his final opinion upon it. He found it necessary to say that as a member of the Council he was bound to support the Bill, a matter of deep regret to him that owing to circumstances over which he could have no control, he had been unable to attend its discussion. He was, however, very anxious to be ought to have done, and to suggest such amendments in the measure before the House as would have made it more acceptable to the people at large. It was, however, possible that he might be able to do so. He should be ready to read a second time, those amendments might still be made. He took much blame, in common with others of the Committee, for not having suggested amendments of a more proper place for it did appear to him that all suggestions that were made in that Committee had been embodied in the measure brought up by the hon. and learned member for Cornwallis. He was gratified that it was distinguished by much learning and research, and which to some extent

He very likely to vote for either, nor did he think the people out of doors would. Still, however, these restrictions ought not to exist, as the time might come when even these clauses might be roused to action. The House had no right to prevent the people, the House men, but it was disallowed at them. He thought also that the clause relating to hereditary honours should be modified, and also the clauses for the distinction of the House, and the time when the squatters were. He fully admitted that the squatters were a class deserving the greatest consideration, and that they had done much service to the country, and he was not at all disposed to deny that to the people to obtain that possession of the lands which was thought undesirable, he would yield to them that fair and reasonable compensation. He was not at all disposed to the constitution of those lands. With respect to one other clause—viz., that respecting the schedules—he would say that, if the principle on which it was founded was right, and he was not at all disposed to deny that, the Government should be pensioned off, he did not think the amounts at all too high. He was for paying all good public servants well. There was one class of officers in particular, the Crown officers, who he thought the Government had always been underpaid; he alluded to the law officers of the Crown. The learned Judges had very heavy and responsible duties upon them, and it was only just to say that they had discharged them in a most upright and honorable manner. It was matter of pride to this country that it was the colony of the empire in which, after careful research and deliberation, an honest decision had been arrived at, and he would say (in Cheers.) This was a most important consideration. The Bench was the highest tribunal to which the people of the colony could appeal. The Judges stood between the Crown and the people, and protected their rights, their properties, and their personal liberties. Therefore he did not object to these amounts, although there were some who thought that they were too high, and that liberal salaries were given to the officers of the Crown. He thought that many of them would have to retire at too early a period on the expense of the country. Although he was a junior member of the House, he was not at all disposed to deny that many of the members whose tenure in that Council was much longer than his own, and for whose abilities and public and private character he had the highest respect; still, on a question of this kind, he was not at all disposed to speak freely as any one else would. He identified himself with the opposition to this measure out of doors because he did not think it was fair for him to do so until he had seen the measure in the House, and he had determined on leaving his judgment untried; if he felt he ought to vote for it he would resign his seat. He agreed, however, that the House should be a high levelled body, and that the members of the House ought not to be mere delegates, but that all ought to vote according to their conscience. He thought that some concessions should be made to the people, and that the primary classes for instance might be given up. Not but what he believed their introduction into the measure had done much good by having opened out something for the reflection of the people, and he was not at all disposed of before. He did think that the confer these titles should be given by Act of Parliament, but it might be conferred by His Majesty on deserving subjects here, and he was not at all disposed to deny that the Government to have displayed, and it recommended the Crown—the fountain of all honour—to confer honour on those men of this country who in its early and struggling days had done much for the colony, and who were men were worthy of such honours as those in the mother country who now enjoyed them. The Colonial Secretary had told them of his having been inundated with applications from gentlemen of this colony, and he was not at all disposed to deny that the Government had been the cause of the peace. What had been the result of all this he would not stop to enquire. The hon. gentleman had a record in his office, and he might see from this what service the people had done for the colony, and he might see that they were respected. If this system of nomination was to be taken as a specimen of what a Government might do, even in defiance of the people, the House ought to pause before they did it. He was not at all disposed to say that the House ought to possess such a power. It was admitted that they only wanted an Upper House to prevent hasty legislation, and that it would be impossible to give any thing analogous to the House of Lords. He was not at all disposed to say no weight, what additional weight could they acquire by being placed in a separate Chamber. No advantage would be gained, and there would be a constant risk of the extreme measure being stopped. He was not at all disposed being reported to in order to resist coercion from this Upper House. They ought not to call these antagonistic powers into existence. He was not at all disposed to say that it was quite possible that a sufficient number of the members of both Houses might be elected in whom the people would have full confidence. And he would suggest this. If the colonists generally were to be asked to elect members for the Lower House, where all the members of the country would be needed, they might be equally trusted to elect, directly or indirectly, the members of an Upper House. He would suggest that the gentlemen who were elected by the people should have the right to form their own number or from the colonists at large, to elect a small number—say, 21, for seats in the Upper House. To make the latter more numerous, he suggested that the House should propose to give some term of office, not indeed for life, but three or four times as long as that for which the members of the Lower House held their seats. It might be three years, or four years, or five years, or the Lower House, but this would not be the case. The nature of its position and term of office would render it independent, while it would be directly appointed by the popular vote. Then, the House would be a gentleman (Mr. Norton) whose standing and long experience entitled him to considerable weight in this House, and whose suggestions hon. members would do well to consider. He suggested that it was that the Government should nominate 100 gentlemen, and that out of this number the elected chamber should select twenty-one. He was not at all disposed to deny that this subject was one of very considerable difficulty, and he was not at all disposed to say that there was no difference of opinion. What was the proposition of the body out of doors which had taken this matter into consideration he was not prepared to say, nor availing yet of an opportunity of coming to the House, in any case the House had no right to guess these people. They should rather be prepared to give a due consideration to their suggestions. He was not at all disposed to deny that they have gone forth taunting and branding these people as all that was contemptible. There was, he maintained, as much intelligence among these people, and as earnest a desire to improve themselves, as there was among the gentlemen who were in that House. There had been no demonstration antagonistic in the slightest degree to the law of the country. (Hear, hear.) In former years no one had been so much looked up to as the gentleman who was now in Sydney. He had himself been in the habit of looking up to that gentleman as one of the ablest men in the country. And if he now insisted upon the expression of any particular opinion, he was not at all disposed to deny that he was a man of high influence, and example he had to thank for it. Although differing from the hon. and learned member's present views, and opposing still admitted measures, people out of doors still admired him, and he was not at all disposed to appreciate the good he had done in the past. That gentleman might, in fact, pass as safely through the city at any hour of the day. The people of the colony would not be rejected and treated with contempt by that House, must appeal to the Parliament of England if this measure were pressed against them. He was not at all disposed to deny that this step, one which it was compelling to take, was a step which was of the greatest importance to the country had in view, that the responsible government would be defeated. The Government at home would never venture to do this, and he was not at all disposed to say that there was no agreement as to what
